Similarities and Differences of MLK and Nelson Mandela

Everyone knows the famous names of Martin Luther King Jr. and Nelson Mandela. But what great things did they do? Why are they so famous?

To start, the two weren't very well known. They were both raised by leaders, but that didn't make everyone take notice. Born 11 years from each-other, in different countries, it is remarkable how similar their worlds were. In both cases, black people were considered less than white people.

Each were impressively smart, King skipping two grades and both going to and graduating college. However, neither paths were straight. Nelson was expelled from his first college, Fort Hare, for leading a student protest and went to the University of South Africa, while King took his education in chunks, going to one college for one degree, pausing going to another for another degree, and so on. For their first schools, they were the finest, raised to be a leader.

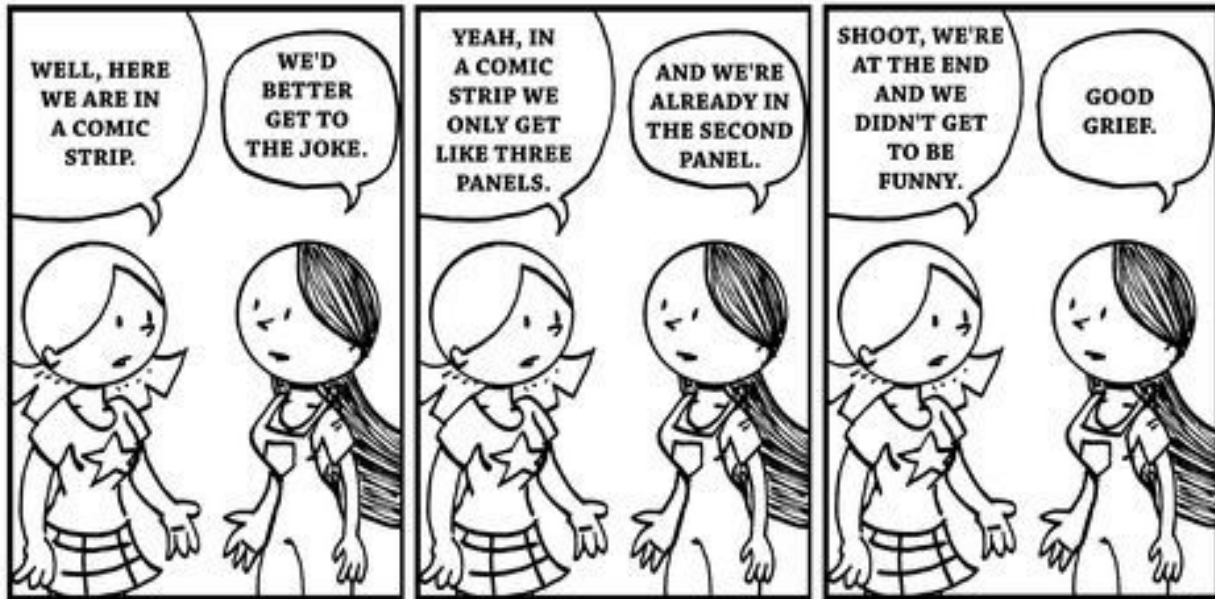

Even crazier, both men fought for the same thing; equal, civil rights. This is what made them amazing people. They went against violence with peaceful protests, never using violence themselves, and never, ever, gave up.

However, it wasn't easy. Nelson went to jail many times, altogether equaling 27 years. King was jailed over 20 times, his house bombed, experienced frequent threats, and more. In the end, after King passed the Civil Rights Act, he was shot. He was only 39 years old when he was assassinated by James Earl Ray. Nelson lived a happy life afterward, he himself also passing laws, and even became South Africa's first black president.

Martin Luther King Jr. and Nelson Mandela were great people. We need more of them.
